These needs are particularly acute during space trails, when astronauts are outside their ships. As NASA explained, space suits are sophisticated protective clothing with oxygen tanks, carbon dioxide scrubs, active fingertip heaters and other protective equipment. In space there are many dangers from which not everyone can be protected. Nothing in space is small, the real danger of being struck by a small meteorite traveling thousands of miles too into all the materials currently used. It's more of a risk to continue the ship gets out of the ground. Another risk that increases with distance is radiation. The earth's atmosphere and magnetic field protect against cosmic rays and many forms of star radiation. Current technology does not really protect astronauts from this risk, which accumulates, the longer astronauts are in space. Another long-term risk of space travel is bone-muscle degradation from inactivity. Astronauts on the International Space Station perform exercises to help compensate, but they are only partially effective. Future technologies may include inertia-based simulated severity to reduce this risk. Keep up with the latest daily bustle with buzzfeed daily newsletter!
